The Role

You will join a dynamic and vibrant Leadership, Work and Organization (LWO) Subject Group that is committed to collegiality and academic citizenship. We are a globally connected, locally rooted and compassionate community that embraces diversity and advances challenges of social justice through our research, scholarship, and engagement with partners, to achieve a lasting impact from our management education. You will complement LWO's existing expertise and enhance the thematic areas of interest of our Strategy, International Business and Society (SIBS) research community. Reflecting Newcastle University Business School's commitment to Ethics, Responsibility and Sustainability, we expect the successful candidate to undertake socially relevant and important research that forms a critical connection with your teaching and addresses current and future problems.

We are seeking a passionate researcher in international strategy and business who look for opportunities to collaborate across management fields and disciplines. Your passion will come across in your teaching and support for the student experience at all levels as well as in your commitment to engaging with communities beyond the University. Your contribution to teaching may include post-experience, postgraduate or undergraduate modules in international business and capstone projects depending on experience. The ability to contribute to teaching quantitative research skills for management and experience of teaching with simulations is a bonus.

The University has developed an Academic Job Summary Guidance document which summarises the range of activities that academic colleagues may be expected to perform.

This is a full time open ended post. Shortlisting will take place mid January with interviews being held on Thursday 6th February 2025.

Informal enquiries about this position can be made to Professor Tracy Scurry at tracy.scurry@ncl.ac.uk
